Read the following passage and answer the questions that follow:

Many spiritual paths advocate a mental state called detachment, in which a person moves away from worldly concerns and becomes an observer of life. Raja Yoga also teaches 'detachment', but the image used to explain the concept is not that of a dusty-footed pilgrim scaling a mountain, but of a lotus flower.

The main thing about a lotus flower is that it has its roots in the mud. It cannot grow without the mud and yet its petals are pristine. This is detachment which is being close to what you most want to be free of, and using it to make you grow; not separating yourself from anything. Take your own personality: Usually, there are aspects of yourself that either you are unaware of, or you just don't like. Unconsciously, you distort them into something attractive. Hence hard work in a person often denotes fear of disapproval. This is the direct opposite of detachment: doing something, not for its own value, but to enhance your personal position.

The lotus flower doesn't turn mud into anything. Mud is mud. Yet, mud also has nutrients needed to aid the flower's growth. We too are in a situation that we don't like – 'in the mud'. And yet, it is probably the most secure position there - if we could only recognise it, not distort it, and let it 'grow us'.

Alternatively, we want to be free of someone, to be alone, but the relationship has somehow caught hold of us. The person now close to us is probably the best teacher we could have, if we were only able to see the 'nutrient' in their presence; if we could recognise too, that we are probably focusing on a very minor aspect of their personality, and totally disregarding the rest. Detachment is freedom from slants and bias of this kind. It means seeing the whole picture.

प्रस्तुत गद्यांश को ध्यानपूर्वक पढ़कर पूछे गए प्रश्नों के सही उत्तर वाले विकल्प चुनकर लिखिए।

सुरक्षा एक स्वाभाविक प्रवृत्ति है। जानवर भी अपनी सुरक्षा के लिए खोह या माँद बनाते हैं। पर सुरक्षा की दृष्टि से पशु-पक्षी मानव-जाति के सामने पूरी तरह पराजित है। मानव ने बुद्धि की शक्ति द्वारा इस क्षेत्र में अधिक प्रगति कर ली है। उसने पशु-पक्षियों को अपना गुलाम बना लिया है। कितने ही पशु-पक्षियों को वह मारकर खा जाता है। कितने ही खूँखार जानवरों को उसने अपने वश में कर लिया है। प्रकृति पर विजय पाने में मानव ही सबसे अधिक सफल हो सका और इस प्रकार उसने अपने जीवन को अतिशय सुरक्षित कर लिया। इस सबका एक ही कारण है कि वह अन्य प्राणियों की तुलना में कहीं अधिक बुद्धिशाली है।

बुद्धि के द्वारा ही मानव ने अपनी सुरक्षा के तमाम साधन उपलब्ध किए हैं। अपने शरीर की सुरक्षा के लिए उसने बहुत से उपाय खोजे हैं और आज भी वह खोजता जा रहा है। शरीर की सुरक्षा भोजन, वस्त्र, शस्त्र, आवास तथा शरीर को सुख देने वाले साधनों से ही होती है। जो चीज़ें शरीर को कष्ट पहुँचाती हैं वे मानव की सुरक्षा में बाधक हैं, जो उसे सुखी बनाती हैं वे उसे जीवित रहने में मदद पहुँचाती हैं।

सुरक्षा के लिए ही भोजन की आवश्यकता पड़ती है और युद्ध की भी। भूख लगना, भोजन खोजकर खाना और अपनी प्राण-रक्षा के लिए युद्ध करना, यह प्रवृत्ति सभी प्राणियों में पाई जाती है। इन्हीं लक्ष्यों की प्राप्ति में मानव ने बुद्धि-शक्ति के द्वारा समाज-रचना की, सभ्यता तथा संस्कृति बनाई। ज्ञान, विज्ञान, शिक्षा आदि के द्वारा इन्हें और समृद्ध किया। इस सबका मूल लक्ष्य जाति की सुरक्षा, सुख-समृद्धि तथा आनंद

इस प्रकार सुरक्षा की भावना से ही मानव का विकास हुआ है। सुरक्षा सुख की द्योतक है, आनंद का स्रोत है।

Read the passage given below and answer the Questions:

Since the 16th century, a disproportionate amount of the world's great violins has come from Cremona, a city in northern Italy. The luthiers Andrea Amati and Antonio Stradivari were both from Cremona. Their instruments—along with those of another luthier, Giuseppe Guarneri—have inspired almost every contemporary take on violin design, but the originals are still peerless.

In 1751, the renowned Italian violinist Francesco Geminiani took a break from bowing and set pen to paper. He wrote, a great violinist had one job: to achieve “a Tone that shall in a Manner rival the most perfect human Voice.” Recent research has shown that the instruments themselves may help players accomplish Geminiani's directive. Not only do great violins sing like humans, but those built by different makers also may remind us of different types of human voices.

The study also found that the wood in old violins had been through a lot. It had been treated with chemicals, possibly to ward off bugs and fungus. It had dried out; and it had vibrated so much from centuries of playing that its very fibers had begun to separate. These centuries of experience, the researchers postulate, helped to give the instruments their particular tone.

The most recent study focused on the sound itself. Researchers had already found sonic similarities between Stradivari notes and particular vowel sounds as sung by humans. The investigation recorded a violinist playing 15 different violins: five made by the Stradivari family, three made by the Amati family, and the rest made by other famous luthiers. They then had 16 choir members, eight male and eight female, sing the same scale eight times, once for each of the following vowel sounds: “had, head, heard, heed, hod, hoed, hud, who'd.” When the researchers had all of the recordings, they put them through sonic analysis, seeing how different aspects of the violin and human sounds matched up.

Because the researchers were comparing violin sounds with vowel sounds, they focused largely on formants: particular frequency sets that make up vowel vocalizations. When a person says or sings an “I” sound, for example, different parts of his larynx, pharynx, and oral cavity each produce sounds corresponding to a particular set of frequencies, which come together to make up the vowel. The researchers found that, despite lacking this human vocal architecture, the violins, too, produce ‘formants’ or each of several prominent bands of frequency that determine the phonetic quality of a vowel. The sonic overlap with the sung vowels were wide-ranging – while Amati and da Salo violins had formants that resembled those of bass and baritone singers, Stradivari violins' formants were more similar to tenors and altos.

Read the passage given below and answer the Question:

Twenty years after the U.S. publication of Harry Potter and the Sorcerer's Stone, the “Boy Who Lived” shows no sign of dying. One theory holds that the Harry Potter stories are so potent in part because they rework the “mythic pattern”: a hero goes from the workaday world into a supernatural one, battles magical forces, and comes back with an enhanced ability to help others.

It's no mistake that the Harry Potter books tap into some of the most iconic hero story structures of Western culture. Many ‘themes, characters, and plot structures’ of medieval romance appear in the series. Although the Muggle (non-wizard) society outside Hogwarts, has moved into the twenty-first century—with automobiles, telephones and trains – Hogwarts school itself is still rooted in the Middle Ages, from the sealing wax used on their letters to their heraldic insignia. Indeed, much of the fauna of the wizarding world seems to have tromped straight over from a medieval romance, including unicorns, dragons, basilisks, werewolves, and the phoenix.

While the medieval romantic hero Perceval is a natural fighter and extraordinarily fast, Harry has an exceptional facility at broomstick-flying and is a master of the sport of Quidditch. King Arthur is famously loyal and courageous, as is Harry. Many of the books’ magical plot points are modernized versions of what happens in the fourteenth-century Arthurian tale, Claris et Laris. In both stories, characters are able to transform into the likeness of other characters and even experience magical time changes. Both stories involve a magic mantle, magically opening doors, and an extraordinary underwater adventure. Like the Arthurian knight, Harry is sometimes accompanied by loyal companions who aid and abet him in fulfilling his tasks, although in the end he must usually confront the evil knight alone. Like Arthur, Harry pulls a sword out of an object (in The Chamber of Secrets). Like Arthur, Harry is fated to marry a girl named Ginevra (a derivation of Guinevere). And like Arthur, Harry is the result of divine and human commingling. This is fundamentally a pattern of double-outsiderness. Like Arthur and Perceval, Harry is removed from his (supernatural) family, then removed from his secondary (Muggle) family. While a significant place in the wizarding world is his birthright, he nonetheless enters Hogwarts as an outsider who must prove himself through various trials. And if there's one thing readers love, and have since the days of medieval Arthurian romance, it's a plucky outsider who turns out to be the Chosen One.

Read the passage given below and answer the Question:

Why are our brains six times as large as those of other mammals with bodies of a similar size? The leading hypothesis has been that our brain expansion was driven by social pressures, by the need to cooperate or compete with others. But instead the key factor may have been “ecological” challenges like finding food and lighting fires.

“We were expecting social challenges to be a strong promoter of brain size,” says Mauricio González-Forero. He has developed a mathematical model of human brain evolution with his colleague Andy Gardner. Until now, the proposed explanations for our large brains have not been placed on a mathematical footing. Models allow you work out the precise consequences of various hypotheses, which can then be compared with the evidence. “If you don’t have a model, you don’t know what you are testing.”

The model starts with the fact that brains require a lot of energy: the brain is 4 per cent of our body size but uses 20 per cent of our energy. The model also assumes that bigger brains help animals get more energy. Human-sized brains and bodies evolved when the challenges individuals faced were 60 per cent ecological, 30 per cent cooperative and 10 per cent between-group competitive, the model predicts. Several factors underlie this. In particular, while environmental challenges do not change as brains get bigger, social challenges do. For instance, working out when you are being cheated might get harder when those around you get smarter. According to the model, this means between-individual or between-group competition can sometimes decrease brain size. Essentially, the energy costs of trying to stay ahead in this arms race can outweigh the benefits.

While ecological challenges can favor bigger brains, crucially the model suggests they only do so in situations when every little increase in brainpower helps deliver a somewhat bigger reward. For instance, once an animal is smart enough to crack nuts, getting smarter might not help it get any more nuts, so there would be no continuing pressure favoring a bigger brain. But if, say, every improvement in making and using weapons helps hunters catch more food, that can lead to ever bigger brains. This means human culture might have played a crucial role, by allowing young individuals to continue gaining skills by learning from others. In other words, in animals with advanced cultures, the same environmental pressures can have a very different evolutionary effect on brain size.

David Geary of the University of Missouri in Columbia thinks the model is too simple to fully capture the complexities of social living. “The conclusion that human brain evolution was largely driven by ecological pressures, and only minimally by social pressures, is surprising and likely premature.”

Read the passage given below and answer the Question:

The word for an ancient water clock sounds like a name of a Greek goddess: Clepsydra. These age-old time-keeping devices are handsome and intriguing, using the gradual flow of water to measure time. Water clocks date back as far as 500 BC and served as a practical daily tool all over the world for well over a millennium.

In ancient Persia, the water clock was a bowl placed in a large pot filled with water. A small hole would be made in the bottom of the bowl so that water from the pot would slowly flow in; when the bowl became full, it would sink down into the pot, and a trusty time keeper would dump it out and place it back on top of the water inside the pot. Time was thus measured by how many times the bowl sank—a bit like an hourglass with the sand swapped out for water. This bowl-pot tag team is one of the oldest time-measuring technologies, with evidence of use by Babylonians, Egyptians, and Native Americans, among others.

The water clock, or fenjaan, was employed in Persia to ensure fair irrigation practices. Due to the arid environment, farmers there built underground irrigation channels that carried water from aquifers to separate properties. In Persia, this system was called qanat, but it also existed elsewhere, including China's modern-day Xinjiang Province, where you can still visit the qanat (in Uighur, karez) in the city of Turpan. Two trusted older men from the village were chosen as full-time clock managers. They were known as khaneh fenjaan and tasked with monitoring water flow day and night. Their role was critical in ensuring that water in the qanats was diverted equally to different farms.

There also existed an even simpler form of outflow clepsydra, known for its use in timing speeches in ancient Rome. This water clock was basically a graduated cylinder with a hole, the passage of time measured by keeping track of the level of remaining water. It could be filled halfway for short speeches and topped off for longer ones, and if a speech or hearing required suspension, the hole could be temporarily plugged with wax. Later and more complicated forms of clepsydra incorporated mechanisms involving gears and wheels, and clepsydras remained in wide use until pendulum clocks made their debut in the 17th century.

But, should you ever find yourself stranded in the woods sans modern technology and trying to hold an election, you can fashion a fenjaan to keep candidates' speeches in check.

Read the passage given below and answer the Question:

Today, there is a crisis of trust in science. Many people – including politicians and, yes, even presidents – publicly express doubts about the validity of scientific findings. Meanwhile, scientific institutions and journals express their concerns about the public’s increasing distrust in science. Understanding why people distrust science will go a long way towards understanding what needs to be done for people to take science seriously.

It is important to systematically map which factors do and do not contribute to science scepticism and science (dis)trust in order to provide more precise explanations for why a growing number of individuals reject the notion of anthropogenic climate change, or fear that eating genetically modified products is dangerous, or believe that vaccines cause autism.

Political ideology is seen by many researchers as the main culprit of science scepticism. They have shown that political conservatives in the United States have become more distrusting of science, a trend that started in the 1970s. And a swath of recent research conducted by social and political psychologists has consistently shown that climate-change scepticism, in particular, is typically found among those on the conservative side of the political spectrum. However, there is more to science scepticism than just political ideology. No relation between political ideology and attitudes toward genetic modification has been found. Nor has any clear relation between political conservatism and vaccine scepticism found.

One of the take-home messages of studies that investigated science trust and science scepticism is that it is crucial not to lump various forms of science scepticism together. First, religiosity has so far been curiously under-researched as a precursor to science scepticism, perhaps because political ideology commanded so much attention. Second, current research lacks a systematic investigation into various forms of scepticism, alongside more general measures of trust in science.

When the aim is to combat scepticism and increase trust in science, a good starting point is to acknowledge that science scepticism comes in many forms. Political ideology, religiosity, morality and knowledge about science are four major predictors of science acceptance and science scepticism. These variables tend to intercorrelate – in some cases quite strongly – which means that they are potentially confounded. To illustrate, an observed relation between political conservatism and trust in science might in reality be caused by another variable, for example religiosity. So, the predictive value of none of these can be shown or verified in isolation.

Identify the correct option:

The most significant message in the fourth paragraph, other than not lumping factors together, is that

Options :

- scepticism and trust are two discrete phenomena and it will be wrong to investigate them together.
- to understand science scepticism, a proper understanding of trust in science is necessary.
- general measures of trust in science are not useful to predict science scepticism.
- more research on science scepticism means less research on causes and effects of science trust.

Read the following passage carefully and answer the Question:

To human ears, the trilling of birdsong ranks among nature's most musical sounds. That similarity to human music is now inspiring researchers to apply music theory to avian vocalisations. For example, a zebra finch neurobiologist together with a musician and musicologist analyzed the song of the Australian pied butcherbird (Cracticus nigrogularis). They found an inverse relationship between motif complexity and repetition that paralleled patterns found in human music. They found that birds can perceive rhythm and change their calls in response. Zebra finches, a vocal learning species, adapt their innate calls—as opposed to learned song—to avoid overlapping with unusual rhythmic patterns produced by a vocal robot. The researchers also found that both, males and females use the brain's song system to do this, although females do not learn song.

But these complexities of birdsong might be more comparable to human speech than to human music. Some birds don't discern rhythm well. Zebra finches, for example, seem to pay attention to pauses between notes on short time scales but have trouble recognising overarching rhythmic patterns—one of the key skills thought necessary for musical perception.

Instead of rhythm, birds may be analysing their peers' songs by the melody. A recent study found that European starlings (Sturnus vulgaris) distinguish shifting four-tone sequences by their “spectral shape”, a statistical representation of all the frequencies in a sound most similar to timbre. They listen to sounds more as we listen to speech. This view is, however, not universal and is contended. Song is actually not language because the song is not information in a strict sense. It's much more like a performance, where the goal is to captivate the audience.

When successful, a bird's song broadcasts individuality (and sometimes fitness) as well as membership in a species and even a local subculture. Male songbirds achieve this by embellishing the songs they learn from their fathers, but some distinct song characteristics appear to be at least partly innate. How female birds recognise these cultural markers and decide which song is best “is a complete mystery.”

Read the 'letter to the editor' given below:

At the outset, sting operations are unethical and expose a perverse tendency among a few media houses or journalists to create ripples among a cross-section of society that is ready to lap up any information bordering on sensationalism (OpEd page, 'From the Readers' Editor' – "Lying to get the truth", May 28). In the past, the Bofors investigation and the exposé on the cement scandal in Maharashtra are examples of investigative journalism which employed painstaking and conventional methods and had greater reach and acceptability. Resorting to a sting operation exposes a lack of dynamism on a journalist's part to bring out the facts by means of a fair investigation. It can also result in irreversible damage to the victim. There needs to be a legal stand on sting operations so that journalistic ethics are preserved. With social media now almost out of control and there being no way of checking misinformation being spread, journalists have a moral duty to earnestly pursue the rules and the standards for a proper conduct and practice of journalistic principles.

Chennai

Which of the following options best evaluates the highlighted sentence in terms of its effectiveness in developing the idea in the letter?

Identify the correct option:

Options :

- The writer fails to signal the contrast between 'sting' operations and investigative 'operations' from the past but asserts why and how the 'past' operations were better.
- The writer attempts to change the topic of dispute – shift the focus from a criticism of 'sting' operations to recommending 'investigative' operations
- The writer clearly signals that he is attempting to introduce a contrast from the past, which employed 'better' methods, to 'sting' operations, so that his critique of sting operations could continue.
- The writer brings in the idea of past which relied on investigation, which employed transparent methods and produced better effects, to criticize the attempt to resort to sting operations, but the lack of signal would confuse the reader.

A letter to the editor of The Telegraph is given below.

Identify the correct option

SIR – Did any broadcaster remark on the significance of the colours of the Queen's outfit for the wedding: green, white and a very prominent splash of purple on her hat?

As feminists ought to know, these were the colours of the Suffragette movement, explained at the time as purple for freedom and dignity, white for purity in private and public life, green for hope and spring.

Was it a coincidence or to emphasise the information on the Duchess of Sussex's future interests now published on the Royal family's website?

Which of the following statements best summarises the writer's intent?

Options :

- Criticize the media for ignoring the colours worn by the Queen
- Point out a change in Royal Family traditions, which would accept feminist views

✔ Indicate a point missed in media coverage, interpreting the Queen's outfit in Suffragette terms

✘ Explain feminism to the uninitiated and state the colours feminist movements favour

Given below is a letter to the editor. What is the 'implied communicative function' of the writers of the letter?
Identify the correct option:

The achievement of the people of Tuticorin, Tamil Nadu, southern India, in securing the closure of the dangerous Vedanta copper smelting plant deserves congratulation....

But it is too soon to claim success, as the people of Bhopal, further north in Madhya Pradesh, could warn. Your report mentions high levels of pollution in groundwater but says nothing about cleansing the site, so local people's health will still suffer.

The struggle for justice in Bhopal has lasted 33 years. Contamination of the groundwater in Bhopal preceded the 1984 poison gas leak and continues to spread through the inaction of those responsible.

It is important to eat “whole foods” — plant foods exactly as they grow in nature. The more times that food is handled, the more opportunity for contamination. One other important method for “How to Reduce the Risk of Food Poisoning” (Personal Health column, by Jane E. Brody, May 29) is to avoid, as much as possible, prepared, pre-cut, pre-washed produce and food.

There are many benefits to eating unprocessed, whole foods, including enhanced nutritive and environmental benefits, but one of the most important is increased food safety.

These plays were an intermediate step in the transition from liturgical to professional secular drama, and combine elements of each. They were performed by quasi-professional groups of actors who relied on public support; thus the plays were usually short, their serious themes tempered by elements of farce. The action of these plays centers on a hero, such as Mankind, whose inherent weaknesses are assaulted by such personified diabolic forces as the Seven Deadly Sins but who may choose redemption.

Identify the critic who made this observation about Shakespeare:

His story requires Romans or kings, but he thinks only on men. He knew that Rome, like every other city, had men of all dispositions; and wanting a buffoon, he went into the senate-house for that which the senate-house would certainly have afforded him. He was inclined to shew an usurper and a murderer not only odious but despicable, he therefore added drunkenness to his other qualities, knowing that kings love wine like other men, and that wine exerts its natural power upon kings. These are the petty cavils of petty minds; a poet overlooks the casual distinction of country and condition, as a painter, satisfied with the figure, neglects the drapery.

Identify the FALSE assumption:

Dickens assails many evils in his novels. Amongst them, arguably, is his 'treatment' of lawyers, their craft and 'stage' [the courts – where we have even sleeping judges] was rather pungent as

Options :

- he was a victim of lawyers, just as his creation Mr. Pickwick was
- he had practiced as a law-clerk and had first and familiar with the flaws in the legal system
- he felt “it is better to suffer a great wrong than to have recourse to the much greater wrong of the law.”
- he had neither the skill nor the opportunities to become a lawyer and was jealous of the profession.

Poe not only wrote impressive short-stories/tales but offered certain design-criteria for them, which inform and form his literary theory. Poe did not mention one of them.

Identify that option:

Options :

- ✘ It is an artistic composition controlled to produce a single unified effect.
- ✘ Its compactness makes both high excitement in the reader and maximum artistic control by the writer possible.
- ✔ It achieves its effect of horror, sarcasm, and passion, but has no preconceived effect as its goal.
- ✘ Its brevity allowed the writer to strive for that "unity of effect or impression" --- a supreme criterion of aesthetic judgement.

T.S. Eliot suggests that William Blake simply did not have the gift of knowing “how to borrow as Dante borrowed.” How do critics rebuff Eliot and defend Blake?

Options :

- Because he can feel so acutely, being a priest, the loss of hope among the drowning nuns.
- Because, through such impersonation, he will be able to trace the inscape of hope and enable us to feel its instress.
- Because loss of hope ages people quickly and fills them with despair, causing them to mourn their fate
- Because impersonation helps create more telling images than normal mimetic ones.
